The author has been to several Beatles shows and the book is based on those experiences. One thing that the author suggests is that if you're expecting The Beatles to sing or perform some cool trick like their famous "Twist and Shout", you're in for a big surprise. The Beatles would never make any public appearance that was not perfectly choreographed, and no way did they ever sing any of their music on stage. The author suggests that the reason is that they're concentrating on their vocal chords, which is something they didn't need. The author also states that they have a lot of people around them who are there to record, so there is a large group of people working on the songs. The author suggested that they could not have done what they've done without making sure it came out right. There was a lot of planning, and the author suggested that they may not even have played certain songs live. They may have played them live, but then not sung them at all. One such song is I've Just Seen a Face. The author suggests that John Lennon and Paul McCartney may have taped I've Just Seen a Face a week or two before they went on stage. The author suggests that it's possible that they made some changes to the recording and recorded that one live, which is what we hear today. And that's why The Beatles sound so different today than what they sounded like years ago. When I told my class this theory, they were fascinated. I told them that as I listened to their music over the last year, I kept thinking that there were some strange things happening on stage that were not on the record. Of course the usual suspects are the people handling the instruments and making sure that everything works right. But the author suggested that one person was there to monitor the audience and the other was there to monitor the crowd. I showed them one of the shows where something odd happened, during the introduction of Please Please Me. You can hear George Martin asking the audience, "Who can sing?" You can tell by the sound 2d92ce491b
