Blood, sweat and tears "Life without rules" (blood, sweat and tears) has become a theme in the history of technology, with its own characteristics and requirements. While the history of technology describes the emergence of technologies in general, and technological inventions in particular, this article describes the evolution of the specific area of technologies used in the food industry. "Life without rules" is the theme of many a science-fiction novel. It has the same aspect in real life. Success in technology is a result of a technological breakthrough which has a decisive importance. Technology is not the cause of the breakthrough but is rather the condition for the breakthrough and a result of the process. The breakthrough thus is, with the help of a technological invention, the process that leads to a specific result and enables the result. The technological breakthrough is not just a technical innovation, it is a completely new way of thinking and acting, a new value system. From the technological revolution in the food industry that started in the Middle Ages, we can find the following aspects that together are the foundation for the emergence of the concepts that will later be known as the technology of the future. The experience of the Third Reich (1930–1945) At the end of the 1930s, the German food industry suffered from the First World War and the associated food shortage. Germany was, however, a very rich country in terms of natural resources, in particular natural fats and oils. The consequences of the new technology of fat storage were shown in the German military's refusal to fight under the new conditions. Today, we know it as the "fat man disease". In 1930, Germany's great food industry leaders, the directors of the five large meat-packing companies, feared for the future. As a result, the directors founded the Reich Food Committee. The committee was created 70238732e0
