The "tremendous brouhaha" around a British researcher's comments at a conference in 2006 has put him off future speaking engagements, he says.

The 84-year-old said "girls" had a hard time in biological research, and that "we get a lot of dicks in biology". He added that he "must have been drunk" at the time because he "doesn't remember" making the comments. The Nobel prizewinner has previously been accused of sexism. Tim Hunt is an honorary professor at University College London and was awarded the Nobel prize for his research into how cells grow and multiply. The Royal Society, of which he is a fellow, awarded Hunt the Royal Medal in 2014. In 2006 he gave the Royal Institution Christmas Lecture, which has a long and distinguished history. His 2006 lecture was entitled What do you do if you are a woman? Some of his comments in the lecture have sparked controversy in the past, but this is the first time he has commented on them publicly. Hunt said that he had previously given "very well-received lectures". In the lecture he told the audience: "I can't understand why it is that women are given jobs in science and then treat those jobs
