comment about children in the nursery intended as a metaphor? In The Hobbit, Chapter IV, Gandalf explains that Bilbo has been put to sleep for two days, but when he awakens he will remember nothing of the adventure: ‘That is the way with all memories,’ said Gandalf. ‘And so there is nothing for you to do, except to get up and go to sleep again, and then to start your story again. Perhaps that will be a happy one.’ The Hobbit Chapter IV, Bilbo At the time of the writing of the story, Bilbo had two children, Frodo and Samwise, and later Frodo's son Merry. Did Tolkien mean the part about ‘having children’ by Gandalf is a metaphor, or was it intended as literally a fact? A: The exact context of the phrase seems to be Bilbo's visit to the Shire. We know that Bilbo was quite happily married at that point, and had a son named Frodo. The phrase is also a very literal, though melancholy statement by Gandalf, saying that Bilbo will never be able to see his children grow up, and that the experience will be something he must live through again. “Yes,” said Gandalf, “that is the way with all memories, and so there is nothing for you to do, except to get up and go to sleep again, and then to start your story again. Perhaps that will be a happy one.” This clearly refers to Bilbo's experience as a child. It's not so much 2d92ce491b
